

My financial assets

Complete this checklist of everything you own to make life easier for your family if the worst happens and you die or are unable to manage your financial affairs

Making sure your loved ones can easily access important documents like your Will, share certificates, bank account details and life assurance plans after your death.

Losing a friend or relative is never easy, and this traumatic period can be made worse when having to deal with their financial affairs after they die. Sadly, people often have to spend vast amounts of time and energy sifting through piles of paperwork to try and find key information about their relative's finances.

As well as making a challenging time even more difficult, this laborious process also means some of your assets could go undetected. For example, you may have a life assurance plan that is due to pay out, but if the accompanying documents aren't readily available there's a real risk that the executors of your estate won't ever find out about it.

Financial assets can be 'lost' for a number of reasons, whether someone dies, forgets to update their address details, or makes investments and doesn't tell their partner. Companies will usually try and find customers when funds are due to be paid out, but this can't be guaranteed.

As a result, it's vital that you make important documents like your Will, share certificates, bank account and life assurance plans easily accessible for your loved ones. By incorporating this process into your estate planning strategy, you can help reduce your inheritance tax bill and ensure the best possible future for those you care about. It also means they'll receive their inheritance much quicker and more efficiently than if they have to search for all the relevant documents after your death.

It's also worth making sure all your documents are in order in case you suffer a serious accident or illness, such as a stroke or heart attack.

Keeping track of your finances

To help you and your relatives keep track of your assets, we've created this checklist. We've also included a contacts checklist so that you can list the details of any professionals involved in your financial affairs, like your solicitor, accountant and financial adviser.

When you've completed the checklist, keep a copy for you and one for your family.

My Will

A Will is a short but important document because it helps you determine who receives your financial assets and any items after your death. Once you've made your Will, keep it in a safe place and ensure your family knows where it's located. It's important to review it every couple of years to make sure it still aligns with your wishes and to make any updates if your personal circumstances have changed (for example, if you have divorced or remarried).
